How did the Fund perform during the reporting period?

The Horizon Active Risk Assist Fund seeks to capture the majority of returns associated with equity market investments while mitigating downside risk through a dynamic risk overlay strategy. For the year ending November 30, 2024, global equity markets delivered strong returns with a consistent upward trend. Given this market environment, the Fund performed as expected in terms of risk and return during the period.

The Fund's underlying equity portfolio was tilted toward U.S. large-cap growth and U.S. large-cap quality equities throughout the period, which benefited from robust earnings and improving macroeconomic sentiment. The Fund's diversified approach was a headwind to performance during the period as many international markets and much of the domestic equity universe underperformed capitalization-weighted market indices.

There was no tactical de-risking or reinvestment activity during the period. Therefore, the Fund's realized volatility aligned with that of the global equity market. This realized volatility was higher than what can be expected on average through a full market cycle.
